Rooman v. Belgium \(application no. 18052/11\)

The applicant, René Rooman, is a Belgian and German national who was born in 1957 and is detained in the Paifve social protection facility, located in a French-speaking region of Belgium. The case concerns the proceedings brought by Mr Rooman on account of the lack of psychiatric care in the facility in which he is detained.

In 1997 Mr Rooman was convicted of theft and sexual assault. While in detention he committed further offences. On 16 June 2003 the Liège Court of First Instance ordered his detention in a psychiatric institution. On 21 January 2004 Mr Rooman was admitted to the Paifve facility.

Mr Rooman applied for release on a trial basis. On 27 January 2006 the Mental Health Board held that an institution should be found which could admit the applicant and provide him with therapy in German, the only language he understood and spoke. After various reviews of his situation, the Mental Health Board rejected his application for release on 26 January 2007, and observed that no institution existed that could meet the security and language-related requirements in the applicant's case.

On 13 November 2013 Mr Rooman applied for release for the third time. In January 2014 a report from the Paifve social protection facility observed that Mr Rooman did not speak French and had very little contact with his fellow inmates and with staff. The report found that he should continue to be detained, citing among other reasons his "untreated mental health problems". The Mental Health Board rejected the application for release on a trial basis, as the requisite conditions of improvement in the applicant's mental state and guarantees for social rehabilitation were not met. The Board stated that "the mere fact that he speaks only German does not mean that the Paifve social protection facility has not taken all the necessary steps to provide him with the care his condition requires." The Higher Mental Health Board upheld that decision. In June 2014 the Court of Cassation quashed the decision of the Higher Mental Health Board on the grounds that it had not replied to the applicant's argument that he was not receiving care appropriate to his situation, in view of the fact that he spoke and understood only German and that there were no German-speaking staff members in the facility where he was being held. The case was sent back to the Higher Mental Health Board, which on 22 July 2014 requested the Mental Health Board to appoint a panel of German-speaking experts to provide an update of the expert psychiatric report issued in January 2009. It also requested the head of the Paifve facility to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the requisite care was made available, by at least providing the services of a German-speaking psychiatrist and psychologist.

In parallel with these appeals, Mr Rooman also started proceedings against the Belgian State. On 10 October 2014 the urgent-applications judge found that there had been a breach of the applicant's right of access to health care and that his situation amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment.

The judge ordered the Belgian State to appoint a German-speaking psychiatrist and medical auxiliary and to provide Mr Rooman with the care routinely provided to the French-speaking inmates.

Lastly, Mr Rooman filed a negligence claim against the Belgian State. On 9 September 2016 the French-language Brussels Court of First Instance found the State liable for negligence and ordered it to pay EUR 75,000 in compensation to the applicant.

Relying on Article 3 (prohibition of torture) and Article 5 § 1 (right to liberty and security) of the European Convention on Human Rights, Mr Rooman complains of the lack of psychiatric care in the facility where he is detained.

Körtvélyessy v. Hungary \(no. 2\) \(no. 58271/15\)

The applicant, Zoltán Körtvélyessy, is a Hungarian national who was born in 1965 and lives in Budapest. The case concerns his complaint about the authorities banning a demonstration he had planned.

On 9 October 2009 the police authorities banned a demonstration Mr Körtvélyessy intended to organise the next day in Venyige Street, Budapest, to protest against the persecution of national radicalism. They notably found that there was no alternative route for the traffic in the neighbourhood, meaning that a demonstration would cause great disruption. Because of the ban, the demonstration did not take place.

Mr Körtvélyessy requested judicial review of the police decision. His complaint was, however, rejected on 15 October 2009 on the ground that the demonstration would have notably impeded traffic heading to the facilities located in Venyige Street, a dead end, and that the disruption might have extended to a major thoroughfare in the vicinity.

Relying on Article 11 (freedom of assembly and association) of the European Convention, Mr Körtvélyessy alleges in particular that the sole reason for the ban – traffic disruption – was excessive, arguing that Venyige Street, with the service lane included, was wide enough to accommodate the expected 200 participants without major incident.

Lengyel v. Hungary \(no. 8271/15\)

The applicant, András Jánosné Lengyel, is a Hungarian national who was born in 1960 and lives in Budapest. The case concerns the reform of the Hungarian social security system, and a resulting dramatic decrease in Ms Lengyel's disability benefit.

Ms Lengyel retired in November 2006 and received a disability pension based on her reduced capacity to work. When the state's assessment for disability benefits changed in 2012, Ms Lengyel's pension was reduced by half. She was categorised as a person suitable to re-enter the workforce even though, due to other circumstances, the medical authorities did not recommend her rehabilitation. Ms Lengyel appealed the reduction in benefits to the relevant agencies and domestic courts, but the reviewing authorities found that the assessment of her state of health was satisfactory. Her benefits ceased entirely in August 2015.

Relying on Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 (protection of property), Ms Lengyel complains about the drastic decrease in her monthly disability allowance despite the fact that her medical condition had not changed.

McIlwrath v. Russia \(no. 60393/13\)

The case concerns a cross-border family dispute. The applicant, Michael McIlwrath, an American national who was born in 1962 and is currently living in Sesto Fiorentino (Italy), married M.G., a Russian and American national, in New York in 1997. In 1998 they moved to Florence (Italy). They had four children together, born in 1997, 2000, 2002 and 2006.

In August 2011, while the couple were in the middle of divorce proceedings in Italy, M.G. took the children to Russia and never returned. Between 2011 and 2014 Mr McIlwrath travelled to Russia more than 50 times seeking to be reunited with his children, in vain. In 2012 M.G. brought parental authority proceedings in Russia, and Mr McIlwrath applied to the Russian courts seeking to determine the children's residence as being with him.

In October 2012 the Russian Courts determined a temporary contract arrangement pending the resolution of the children's residence proceedings, consisting of Mr McIlwrath spending one hour each week with each child on the premises of their school. This arrangement was however cancelled shortly afterwards – in December 2012 – on the grounds that it was not in the children's best interests. This decision was based on expert advice from a psychiatric centre as well as firm objections by the children's school principal to having any further meetings between Mr McIlwrath and his children on school premises following an incident in which the youngest son fiercely resisted meeting his father.

In the meantime, in September 2012 the Florence District Court had pronounced the divorce judgment: care of the children was granted jointly and the children's residence was determined as being with their father in Italy. Mr McIlwrath applied to the Russian courts for recognition and enforcement of this judgment. His request was however refused (on appeal in March 2013), because the Russian Courts found the Italian judgment to be incompatible with the basic principles of Russian law and public order. The Italian divorce judgment was subsequently quashed by the Florence Court of Appeal in March 2014, as it found that it could not take measures in relation to the personal relationship between Mr McIlwrath and M.G. or other issues concerning their children. Following this, the Russian courts finally decided on the matter in May 2014, ordering that the children live with their mother and that Mr McIlwrath pay child maintenance and determining his contact rights.

In subsequent developments, Mr McIlwrath took his second-born son from Russia to Italy in August 2014 and has never returned the child to his mother. He has not seen his other children since then. In July 2015 M.G. was convicted in absentia by the Italian courts of abducting her four children and given a three-year prison sentence with suspension of her parental authority.

Relying on Article 8 (right to respect for private and family life) and Article 13 (right to an effective remedy), Mr McIlwrath complains that the Russian authorities failed to assist him in being reunited with his children after they had been taken from Italy to Russia by their mother. Further relying on Article 6 § 1 (right to a fair hearing and access to court), he alleges that the proceedings in Russia concerning the recognition and enforcement of the Italian divorce judgment of September 2012 were not fair – as he was not informed of the date of the appeal hearing during those proceedings and therefore was not given the opportunity to be present.

Sklyar v. Russia \(no. 45498/11\)

The applicant, Sergey Sklyar, is a Russian national who was born in 1975 and lived in Novosibirsk (Russia) before his arrest. The case concerns the absence of a lawyer during Mr Sklyar's appeal against his conviction of theft and robbery and the conditions of the prison in which he is presently being detained.

In November 2010, Mr Sklyar was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment for aggravated theft and armed robbery. Although Mr Sklyar was represented by a lawyer during these first-instance proceedings, the appeal against his conviction was made in the absence of counsel. His appeal was unsuccessful and he has been serving his sentence in IK-8 prison in Novosibirsk since February 2011. He complains of the conditions in which he is being detained, in particular alleging that his living conditions are cramped and sanitary facilities are inadequate.

Relying on Article 6 §§ 1 and 3 (c) (right to a fair trial and right to legal assistance of own choosing), Mr Sklyar complains that the criminal appeal proceedings were unfair as the authorities failed to provide him with a lawyer. He further alleges a violation of Article 3 (prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatment) in respect of the conditions of his detention.

Mesut Yıldız and Others v. Turkey \(no. 8157/10\)

The applicants, Mesut Yıldız, Mehmet Siddık Eker and Zeynel Onver, are Turkish nationals who were born in 1975, 1948 and 1958 respectively and live in Denizli. They were members of the organising committee of the Nevruz festival¹ and were convicted by the criminal courts on account of remarks made and slogans chanted during that event.

On 18 March 2003 the applicants informed the authorities that preparations were under way for the Nevruz festival, which was attended by almost three thousand people. On 4 April 2003 the Denizli public prosecutor's office instituted proceedings against them, in their capacity as organisers of the gathering, for offences against the law on public meetings and demonstrations. Some participants had chanted illegal slogans, sung militant songs and expressed separatist views.

On 8 June 2006 the District Court sentenced the organisers to one year and six months' imprisonment and to a fine of 343 Turkish liras (approximately 160 euros (EUR)). On 22 December 2008, following an appeal by the applicants, the Court of Cassation quashed the judgment after the entry into force of new criminal-law provisions. On 7 July 2009 the District Court handed down the same sentences as in the first judgment. However, it decided to suspend delivery of the judgment for five years and ordered that the applicants be placed under supervision for the same period. On 23 July 2009 the Denizli Assize Court dismissed an appeal by the applicants.

Relying on Article 10 (freedom of expression) and Article 11 (freedom of assembly and association), the applicants complain of their conviction, in their capacity as organisers of the Nevruz festivities, on account of the slogans chanted by demonstrators and the speeches made during the event.

Mustafa Sezgin Tanrıkulu v. Turkey \(no. 27473/06\)

The applicant, Mustafa Sezgin Tanrıkulu, is a Turkish national who was born in 1963 and lives in Ankara. He is a member of the Turkish Parliament.

The case concerns a domestic court decision that allowed for the interception, monitoring and examination of electronic communications of everyone in Turkey for about a month and a half in 2005. Former president of the Diyarbakır Bar Association, Mr Tanrıkulu learnt about the decision in June 2005 in a newspaper report. The decision had been taken by the Diyarbakır Assize Court on 6 May 2005; it involved granting the National Intelligence Agency of Turkey permission to intercept all domestic and international communications between 8 April and 30 May 2005 with a view to identifying terrorist suspects. Shortly after, Mr Tanrıkulu filed a criminal complaint against the judge who had made the Assize Court decision, the public prosecutor and the intelligence officers involved in both requesting as well as implementing the decision. However the prosecuting authorities decided not to prosecute the intelligence officers as implementing court decisions did not constitute a crime; and the Ministry of Justice decided not to take any action against the public prosecutor or judge as their acts had fallen within judicial discretion and the decision of May 2005 had been in the interests of national security.

Relying on Article 8 (right to respect for private and family life, the home and the correspondence), Mr Tanrıkulu complains about the decision of May 2005 allowing the interception of communications of anyone in Turkey, including himself. He alleges in particular that the interception measures amounted to abuse of the national legislation in force at the time. He also claims under Article 13 (right to an effective remedy) that he was denied an effective judicial remedy because the national authorities refused to carry out an investigation into his complaints about the interception of his communications.

Nina Kutsenko v. Ukraine (no. 25114/11)

The applicant, Nina Ivanivna Kutsenko, is a Ukrainian national who was born in 1949 and lives in Vyshneve, the Kyiv region (Ukraine). The case concerns the investigation into the death of her son, allegedly as a result of his ill-treatment by the police and the authorities' failure to provide adequate and timely medical care.

Ms Kutsenko's son, V.K., had been reported missing one week before he was admitted to hospital on 25 August 2003 as an unidentified person. Doctors treated him for several injuries to his skull and brain but they did not conduct more comprehensive exams, despite a recommendation by a neurosurgeon to do so, because the hospital lacked the necessary equipment. V.K.'s condition deteriorated and on 3 September 2003 he died after having fallen into a coma.

The Prosecutor General's Office opened a criminal case into his death in October 2003. Over the course of the next 13 years, the investigator in charge of the case changed at least 20 times. Charges were eventually brought against a police officer for causing the injuries which led to V.K.'s death, another officer for watching the beating without intervening, and the doctor in charge of V.K.'s care for failing to transfer V.K. to a regional hospital for further diagnosis or to take measures after he had fallen into a coma. Further charges were brought against the medical examiner who had conducted the autopsy for professional negligence (notably for falsely stating that V.K. had died from diseases caused by alcohol and drug addiction and failing to record all of his injuries or to carry out essential analyses); and the police officer who had been in charge of the search when V.K. had gone missing for abuse of office and forgery. Each of these defendants was found guilty but, because the offences were time-barred, none of them served a prison sentence. Ms Kutsenko was, however, successful in multiple civil claims amounting to 261,851 Ukrainian hryvnias (equivalent to about 16,500 euros (EUR) at the time each judgment was rendered), though she claims she has only received about EUR 1,225.

Relying in particular on Article 2 (right to life), Ms Kutsenko complains that her son died as a result of a chain of crimes and omissions by State authorities. In particular, she alleges that her son was tortured while in police custody, that there were deficiencies in his medical treatment, that the police did not conduct an adequate search for him before he had been hospitalised, that the investigation into both the origin of her son's injuries and into her allegation of inadequate medical care were ineffective and lasted too long, and that she only received a small amount of the damages awarded to her under her civil claims.

The Court will give its rulings in writing on the following cases, some of which concern issues which have already been submitted to the Court, including excessive length of proceedings.

These rulings can be consulted from the day of their delivery on the Court's online database HUDOC.

They will not appear in the press release issued on that day.

Lorenz v. Austria \(no. 11537/11\)

The applicant, Günter Lorenz, is an Austrian national who was born in 1964 and is detained in Krems (Austria). Mr Lorenz was convicted in 1984 for, among other things, triple murder and served a 20-year prison sentence. His sentence ended in 2003 but, since then, he has remained in preventive detention, subject to yearly review proceedings to assess whether his mental condition has stabilised enough for him to be safely released. The case concerns his complaint about the lawfulness and expediency of three sets of proceedings for the review of his preventive detention.

Mr Lorenz applied and was denied release in 2008 and 2009. In July 2010, the Vienna Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal against these decisions on the basis that he had not been adequately prepared for release, referring to a number of previous expert opinions, the most recent of which were obtained in 2009 and 2010. He applied for release again in 2010, 2011 and 2013, but, relying on reasoning and expert testimony from the previous review proceedings, the Regional Court and Court of Appeal concluded that he continued to present a danger to society. During the review proceedings from 2010 to 2013, Mr Lorenz refused to undergo further therapy and, in the course of the 2011/12 proceedings, to be examined by an expert. The three sets of review proceedings in question lasted five months, almost eleven months, and four months, respectively.

Relying on Article 5 § 1 (a) and (e) (right to liberty and security), Mr Lorenz complains that the periodic review of his detention in 2010/11, 2011/12 and 2012/13 was unlawful because the courts failed to sufficiently justify the continuation of his detention. He further complains, relying on Article 5 § 4 (right to have lawfulness of detention decided speedily by a court), that these three sets of review proceedings were not conducted with sufficient expediency.

Belkacem v. Belgium \(no. 34367/14\)

The applicant, Fouad Belkacem, is a Belgian national who was born in 1982 and lives in Boom (Belgium). The case concerns proceedings brought by Mr Belkacem following his conviction for incitement to discrimination, hatred and violence on account of remarks he had made in YouTube videos.

On 10 February 2012 the Antwerp Criminal Court found Mr Belkacem guilty on all the charges against him and sentenced him to a two-year prison term and a fine of 550 euros (EUR). Mr Belkacem appealed against that judgment. On 4 May 2012 the Antwerp Criminal Court confirmed the judgment but suspended enforcement of the custodial sentence for five years. The applicant appealed. On 6 June 2013 the Antwerp Court of Appeal sentenced Mr Belkacem to a suspended term of one year and six months' imprisonment and to a fine of EUR 550. The court specified that the offence of public incitement to discrimination, violence and hatred was clear even from the description of the facts. Mr Belkacem lodged an appeal on points of law.

On 29 October 2013 the Court of Cassation dismissed the appeal. It found that Mr Belkacem had not simply expressed his views, but that he had unquestionably incited others to discrimination on the basis of faith and to discrimination, segregation, hatred or violence towards non-Muslims, and had done so knowingly and therefore intentionally.

Relying on Article 10 (freedom of expression), Mr Belkacem alleges that his remarks came within the scope of his freedom of expression and religion and did not constitute a threat to public order.

Poulimenos and Others v. Greece (no. 41230/12)

The applicants, Iraklis Poulimenos, Konstantina Poulimenou, Stavroula Poulimenou, Panagiotis Theodorakopoulos, Ekaterini Theodorakopoulou and Elpida Theodorakopoulou, are Greek nationals who were born in 1947, 1951, 1946, 1946, 1978 and 1981 respectively and live in Kalamata, Corinthia and Athens.

The case concerns the calculation of the final amount of compensation for the expropriation of a plot of land, and in particular the determination of the date of the hearing taken as the reference point for calculating that amount. The date chosen determines whether or not account can be taken of an increase in the value of the land that forms the basis for calculation of the compensation.

Several decrees issued in 1959, 1960 and 1962 ordered the expropriation of land located in Elliniko belonging to the applicants' father.

On 30 November 1997, following the death of their father, the applicants applied to the Athens Court of First Instance for determination of the provisional amount of compensation. On 31 August 1998 the court assessed the provisional amount at 90,000 drachmas (approximately 264 euros (EUR)) per square metre. On 28 April 1999 the applicants applied to the Court of First Instance for determination of the final amount of expropriation compensation. On 24 January 2005 the court took the date of the judgment concerning the provisional amount as its reference point, assessing the amount at EUR 320 per square metre. On 28 April 2005 the applicants appealed, seeking to have the amount of compensation determined by reference to the date of the appeal hearing, in view of the increase in the value of the land between the first-instance judgment and the appeal. On 29 December 2006 the Athens Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal as inadmissible on the grounds that a decision already existed determining the amount of compensation. On 5 April 2007 the applicants appealed on points of law. The Court of Cassation dismissed their appeal on 28 April 2009, on the same grounds as the Court of Appeal.

On 31 August 2009 the applicants re-submitted their appeal, arguing that there had been a substantial increase in the value of the property. On 18 January 2012, following a change in the case-law, the Court of Appeal held that the date of the first hearing determining the final amount of compensation should be used for the purposes of assessing that amount. It assessed the amount at EUR 420 per square metre.

Relying on Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 (protection of property), the applicants complain of the fact that the court calculated the value of the land on the basis of a date very far removed from the date of the hearing to determine the final amount of compensation for expropriation of the land. In their view, this resulted in a lowering of the estimated value of the land and of the corresponding compensation.

The Court will give its rulings in writing on the following cases, some of which concern issues which have already been submitted to the Court, including excessive length of proceedings.

These rulings can be consulted from the day of their delivery on the Court's online database HUDOC.

They will not appear in the press release issued on that day.
